THE QUESTION OF DINNER. A good deal of discussion has taken place in the London papers as to the proper way of getting up a family dinner. It seems to be conceded that English dinners are heavy and indigestible, because they are badly cooked, while French dinners are light and agreeable because they are well cooked. The London Times does not disdain to mingle an editorial on this subject occasionally, with its heavier broadsides on Italian wars and Indian insurrections, and what the Times discusses everybody else takes up. A writer in Bentley's Miscellany, for February, gives his opinions thus: A GREAT DESIDERATUM.—It is to Paris that we must look for any reform among ourselves, and we are certain that the agitation will not be successful unless examples are drawn from that highly-favored capital. It is very easy for our millionaires to secure themselves against any failure; their chiefs have all the appliances to make a puree of game, of which the stock is some half-dozen heasants, or an Apician fish soup in which the meanest components are a turbot and a bottle of vin de grave. Such men stand published, and for sale by above all reform. They can tickle their palate in any way they like, and dine better than all the rest of the civilized world, for they can combine English solidity with French taste. But a class to be sincerely pitied is that composed of men cursed with a moderate competency, and who have married under the delusion that they are going to be comfortable, and enjoy at home their club messes. Poor fellows! how soon and how bitterly are they disappointed. They must have groaned inwardly on perusing G. H. M.'s bill of fare. See what that great Amphitry considers sufficient to satisfy the appetite of the man of taste-"One soup, one fish, three or four entrees, (never more) one releve, one roti, one game (generally enough, unless you have ortolans or beccaficos for a second,) two legumes, and two entremets-in all twelve or thirteen plates." Fancy the tortured reader mildly suggesting to the placens uxor that he should like something of that sort, as a relief after the joints on which he has been dining for the last three months. We can readily imagine her reply.

And yet, after all, if our lady menagere would deign to accept a hint from the French, and not regard it as lowering their dignity to take a look at what is going on in their kitchen, our brightest visions might be realized with very slightly-increased expense. Take, for instance, the French pot-au-feu, the general receptacle of whatever our cooks throw away as useless, and which allows of soups of infinite variety being served up every day. The old prejudice about soup-drinking, frog-eating Frenchmen, has died out, never to return. Throughout the Crimean campaign the French soldiers enjoyed their soup, and we have yet to learn that they were any weaker in consequence. The active Zouaves, who swarmed up the heights of Alma, had many a time been condemned to soupe maigre as a sole resource, and still they did their duty like men. As for the objection that our climate requires the comsumption of nearly raw meat to keep up stamina, it is simply bosh, and the French mechanic far worse paid than the English artisan-has always a comforting or strengthening plate of boulli, when his English brother, through his wife's ignorance of the first principles of cookery, seeks refuge in the gin palace, and deadens his appetite at the same time that he is destroying his constitution. * *

French ladies do not consider domestic duties beneath attention, and although, perhaps, it would be asking too much of wives if we expected them to make our pastry, (and, indeed, we should be very sorry to have our lilustrated Irish Nation, and everything else in gallantry put to the test by having to eat it,) | the cheap Book and Periodical line. ht everes and put a check on that frightful waste which so prominently distinguishes too many of our middle-class kitchens. CULLINARY REFORMS .- One great reform, then, which might be safely introduced, much to our comfort, is the pot-au-feu, the most economical and pleasantest domestic article the French possess. The next point, and one of vital importance, is the introduction among us of the French stove, with its batterie de cuisine. Not only under our present defective system do we waste a little fortune in coals, which go roaring up the chimney, solely for the advantage of the sweeper, but we ruin the virtues of our meat by the reckless way in which we cook it. It is kept at a furious state of ebullition, by which it becomes hardened, and the nourishing portion is dissolved in the water. Now, by the French system of using charcoal, the exact amount of heat required is kept up, and the food when cooked, is easy of digestion, and far more grateful to the palate. The expense of such a stove would not be very great; an intelligent bricklayer would put it up, and the first outlay would be very soon repaid by the saving in fuel. But without such an apparatus it is almost impossible to introduce French cookery among us or prepare those peculiar dishes which are gradually to wean the husband from the club. Ponder on this, dear lady readers, and be warned in time!

It is inconceivable how much can be done with this apperatus. A ship's galley is generally regarded as the best distribution of culinary space, but that is nothing when compared with the French battery. When kept thoroughly clean, which is the first desideratum in every kitchen, it is really a very pleasing sight, and a lady need not fear spoiling her dress if she will condescend to visit the penetralia of her kitchen, and try her hand at some dainty dish for her husband. And if she do so, she may console herself with the reflection that she is but following the example of many illustrious ladies.

VEGETABLES .- Then again look at the scandalous way in which our vegetables are treated-the very finest in the world-but their aroma and flavor is destroyed by an ignorant cook. Culinary sages, from Dr. Kitchener downwards, have urged the importance of having a potato dressed properly, and the difficulty of finding an artiste capable of sending up that esculent in a satisfac-Then why should we run the tory condition. Then why should we run the risk of failure? In M. Gogue's book we find more than forty ways of cooking a potato.-Surely some of these might be introduced among us, instead of having to depend on the watery ball that is served up to us, or that deplorable mixture known by the name of mashed potatoes! Who, too, that ever tasted petits pois dressed in the French or German fashion (the latter, perhaps, being a trifle too sweet,) but holds those dishes in grateful remembrance, and looks with a sigh on his native dish of peas, which come up like bullets, from furious boiling, and swimming in paired at B. F. DENNISS, an ocean of liquified butter? Or, if you are a man fond of bold innovations, just introduce the haricot blane to the notice of your cook, and see what an execrable melange she will SAUCES .- It was Talleyrand who uttered the profound truism that "we had a hundred religions, but only one sauce." His allusion was to melted butter; and we regret to say that were he premitted to visit this upper world again, he would find us in nothing altered since his time. Go where you will this melange stares you in the face, in some shape or other; and yet, after a careful perusal of M. Gogue's book, and although not bred to the profession, we would back ourselves to produce twenty different sauces at an infini-

The lamented Soyer made a bold effort at reform in this respect; his cookery book reached a rale of 250,000 copies, and in it he gives some really superior hints on the important subject of sauces; but he was not destined to be honored in this country, as far as our cooks are concerned. They had been used to melted butter or paste all their lives, and they were not going to change. The consequence is that we are continually being poisoned by this abominable stuff, which, in itself, is of so rebellious a nature, that it is hopeless attempting to destroy its mamby pamby taste by Worcester or Harvey.
